Jul 30, 2010 So I just picked up a Tube Tech CL1b for tracking vocals. Since I already own a BAC-500 and an API525, I was looking for . A: From Softube's webpage: The Classic Channel is a fully versatile analog compressor with two balanced audio inputs. Its ability to provide both compression and limiting make it an ideal compressor for any situation where smooth compression is needed. From this it is not clear whether you need what are known as "normal" limits and/or "hard" limits. Tube Tech presumably includes the information that you need, but is not bound by their terms of use. Taken from here: Normal compression Compression ratio, compression level and release time are all adjustable. Set the ratio to anywhere from 1:1 up to 9:1. Set the compression level to anywhere from -100 to +100 dB. Set the release time (amount of time for the attack, compression ratio and release to be applied before starting to decrease the ratio) to anywhere from 1 to 10 milliseconds. Hard compression Supports hard limiting for both ratio and levels. Hard limit can be set for the ratio anywhere between 1:1 to 10:1. Hard limit can be set for the level anywhere between -100 to +100 dB. If this is the case, yes, the Softube Classic Channel should be more effective than the cheap tube gear you are looking at. It is an analog device and will likely have a more pleasing sound to your ear. the whole mobile application, so it is very important to decide what quality of errors to handle. You don't want to catch all sorts of errors as it is a nuisance for the end user and the error handler might be consuming too much memory or CPU resources. Try catch blocks are not the best solution as you might want to handle also more complex errors. Imagine a situation when you just want to notify the user that he has reached the end of the list. Instead of creating yet another try catch block for that simple case, you can just fire the event: user.ItemsHaveBeenCompleted += this.ItemsHaveBeenCompleted; This pattern hides all the complex errors inside the event handler. In this case, there is no point in using try catch since you are not handling any errors and the event
